

CRITICAL CHANNELS OF CHOICE

TABLE OF CONTENTS

- 3 Full Report Snapshot
- 4 Introduction
- 5 Consumers Pick Omnichannel
- 12 Conclusion
- 13 Expert Commentary
- 16 Demographics
- 18 Sponsors & Partners

FULL REPORT SNAPSHOT

Thank you for downloading the Executive Summary for “Critical Channels of Choice.” To explore the findings of the research in more depth, including the full survey results and segmented analyses by generation, geography and gender, download the Full Report (For $199 or via subscription).

3 EXCLUSIVE DETAILED SEGMENTED ANALYSES ACROSS CHANNEL PREFERENCES BASED ON GENERATION, GEOGRAPHY AND GENDER

46 CHARTS AND GRAPHS

33 TOTAL REPORT PAGES

INTRODUCTION

Research can be funny. It can point to big trends and changes, making a single point feel disruptive and potentially cataclysmic.

A study reported in numerous retail trade publications noted that some 70 percent of Millennials purchased a product via social media. Everyone start your engines... social is the Millennial channel of choice. Or is it? According to Pew Research, 44 percent of Facebook users under 30 have deleted their accounts and apps. So which is it? Are they social... or not?

In the same way that it is increasingly difficult, if not impossible, to define success through a lens of single-point-of-attribution in media mix management, it is equally, if not more difficult, to pin down a single channel of choice for consumers. Or is it?

The CMO Council, in partnership with Pitney Bowes, set out to answer some of these key questions by asking the people at the center of this debate: Consumers around the world.

We started with some definitions:

- We wanted to talk to consumers about communicating with brands
- For the purpose of the survey, “communications” could be any form of communication you want, expect or need between you and the companies you do business with
- We explained that communications could include an email about a coupon for a big weekend sale... or walking into a bank branch to discuss a mortgage statement they just received in the mail
- BUT, we were also clear... we were NOT talking about advertising... we would leave that for another day

What follows is our analysis of the feedback from over 2,000 English-speaking consumers around the world, collected via an online survey conducted through the Pollfish research panel. We asked specific questions around critical, must-have channels of choice for engagement, exploration and service or support. We asked about data, and how much they felt comfortable sharing. And we asked about consequences should brands fall short of their engagement promises.

Regardless of age, gender or regional location, one universal truth quickly came into view:

Omnichannel IS the critical channel of choice.

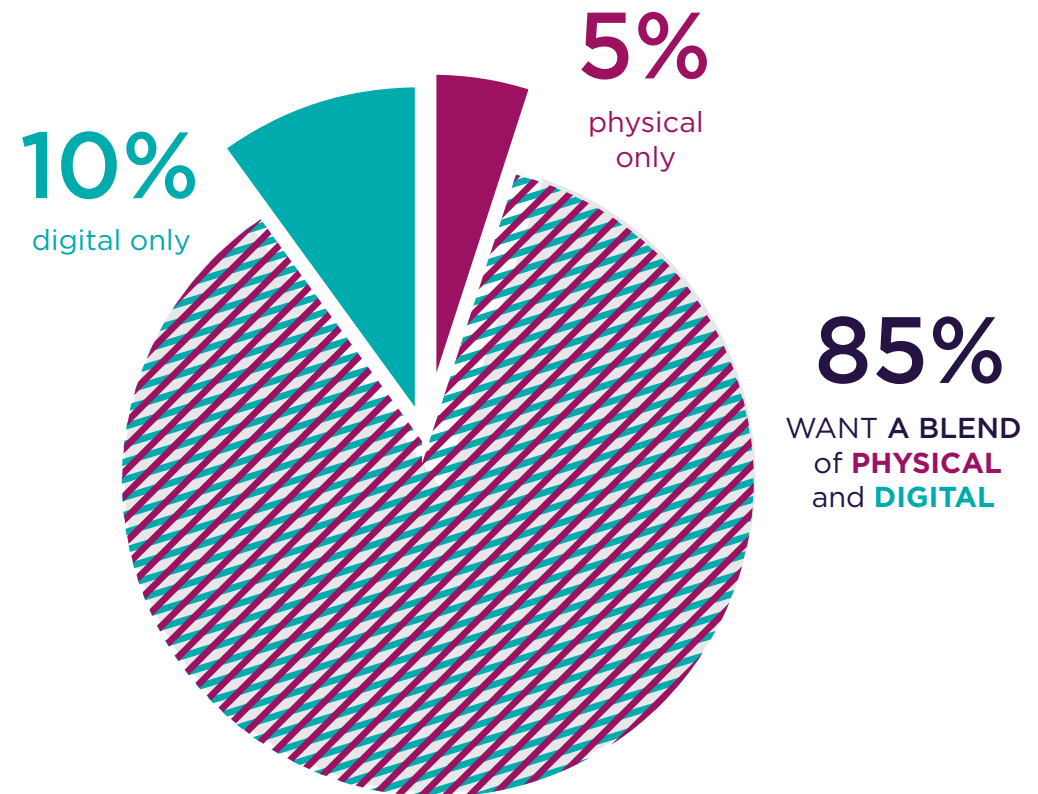

CONSUMERS PICK OMNICHANNEL

When asked to describe their communication preferences, consumers overwhelmingly agree that one path to the brand simply isn't enough... they want them all.

Some 85 percent of consumers the world over agree that their ideal channel is actually a blend of channels, opting for a mix of both digital and physical experiences.

When asked to specify the channels consumers would expect to be available in order to connect or communicate, this omnichannel demand was reinforced. While email was the top channel of choice (selected by 86 percent of consumers as a must-have channel of engagement), a telephone number to call was second on the ranking and having access to a real-life person was among the top five.

Perhaps most telling of this openness for omnichannel is that printed mail, considered by some to be one of the more "traditional" channels in today's marketing mix, continues to be a highly valued channel of choice. One out of every three consumers surveyed expects printed mail to part of their ideal communications mix, punctuating the need for brands to reevaluate how they are leveraging and deploying all of the tools available in an omnichannel toolkit.

THE HUMAN CONNECTION IN OMNICHANNEL

Consumers expect variety... but more than that, they demand value. What becomes clear is that how value is defined links directly back to the degree to which an engagement saves time, saves money or aids a customer in their moment of need. This is especially demonstrated in the top channels customers specifically call out as being critical to their journey. Email tops the list, while access to the brand via telephone comes in second. What is notable here is that live, bi-directional communication actually dominates the top channels. It should also be noted that channels including social media and printed mail are also highly valued and expected as consumers look to enrich and enliven experiences depending on where THEY are in their journey.

This is also true when you consider those channels of engagement that consumers say they can't live without – specifically access to brands by telephone, in-person and via text message. Interestingly, social rises to the top five in criticality, reflecting the growing utilization of the channel by younger generations. It is actually Gen Z – those respondents born after 1997 – driving the expectation for social connection thanks to a belief that social is more convenient and more trusted than other channels of engagement.

Be it social media or the telephone, one common thread ties both channels together for our consumers: both empower an immediate, convenient and trusted two-way channel of communication.

TOP FIVE EXPECTED CHANNELS OF CONNECTION AND COMMUNICATION

THE TOP CHANNEL CONSUMERS COULDN'T LIVE WITHOUT

IT'S OMNICHANNEL, NOT EVERYCHANNEL

Consumers see a difference between the idea of being EVERYWHERE versus being where they need brands to be. There are consumers that have the expectation that brands will be waiting at the destination of their choosing, as 28 percent of respondents say that being omnichannel is critical to a satisfying experience. They believe that brands should be where they want, when they want and ready to communicate how they want. But the majority of consumers (59 percent) are a bit less demanding, understanding that brands can't be everywhere, but are quick to point out that brands need to be in their channels of choice when they need something.

There is also a belief that a brand's ability to BE omnichannel is actually improving over time, with 65 percent of consumers saying that brands are doing "pretty good," when it comes to their ability to engage across both physical and digital channels, even as some brands do better in digital experiences than in live and in-person engagement. Only six percent of respondents give brands a failing grade, while 13 percent believe the brands they do business with are doing an exceptional job.

HOW IMPORTANT IS A COMPANY BEING "OMNICHANNEL" TO YOU?

IMPORTANT: I don't need companies to be everywhere, except when I really need something

CRITICAL: Companies should be where I want, when I want, ready to share and communicate how I expect

UNIMPORTANT: I really do not care if a company has different communication channels

HOW ARE COMPANIES DOING WITH THIS GOAL OF BEING "OMNICHANNEL"?

EXCEPTIONAL: Companies are doing a great job of being in both physical and digital places

PRETTY GOOD: Some companies do better with digital, others with live experiences, but all are better

MEH: Just being honest, nobody is really getting it right today

HORRIBLE: Communicating with most companies is painful and time consuming

CONVENIENCE IS VALUE... AND VALUE IS PERSONAL

When asked why a consumer identified with their top channels of choice - to specify what was so important or resonant with these channels - half of consumer respondents indicated that convenience was the top attribute that kept them coming back for more. While channels that are creative (7 percent), interesting (14 percent) or even informative (17 percent) were nice to have, what makes a channel indispensable is the convenience (50 percent), reliability (45 percent) and speed (41 percent) at which the channel can respond or deliver value and address consumer needs.

The desire to connect is also reflected in the aspects of communications that customers most enjoy. For brands who think the way to their customer's hearts is through great stories and poorly-personalized content, think again. The path to joy is lined with service, convenience and getting consumers back into their lives.

More than anything, consumers are issuing a significant call to action for brands: stop being creative for creativity's sake and make engagements and experiences about ME. This is a call for relevance through personalization instead of poorly executed random acts of data application. Consumers clearly crave a connection... but that connection needs to be directly and obviously related to their lives and their needs.

CRITICAL ATTRIBUTES OF MUST HAVE CHANNELS

TOP ATTRIBUTES OF ENJOYMENT

CONSUMERS IN CONTROL

The myth that Millennials and Gen Z are happy to live their lives totally online with all their data for the world to share is debunked as 42 percent of survey respondents across both age groups say they actually prefer to share only select data and expect to be able to decide where and how that data is used. This is not wildly divergent from the total respondent pool where 40 percent of total respondents said they wanted control over their data.

Even with the promise of more relevant experiences, just one in four consumers say that brands can have total access to any and all personal data in exchange for highly relevant and personalized experiences. The nay-sayers are also not being swayed by personalization as 21 percent indicate they don't want brands collecting, storing or using their data, even it means having personalized experiences.

It is telling that 14 percent of respondents just don't understand why brands need their data in the first place... representing a potentially ripe area of exploration and opportunity for brands willing to take the time to explain and prove why personalization can add value to their consumer's day. Keeping in mind previous findings that indicate consumers want convenience, value and savings as part of their core communications with brands, those brands that can consistently demonstrate the value of a more personalized, relevant and contextual experience across critical channels of engagement will likely see an increased willingness to share key points of personal data.

WHICH STATEMENT BEST DESCRIBES YOUR ATTITUDES ABOUT YOUR PERSONAL DATA?

I am happy to have the companies I do business with collect this data for more relevant experiences

I only want some data that I provide to be stored and I want to decide how that data is used

I don't want companies to store or use my data, even if it means having things personalized

Honestly, I don't know why they need my data or what they do with it

THE COST OF POOR PERSONALIZATION

In the end, consumers may not understand how marketers define personalization... but they sure understand how it feels when marketers don't personalize experiences. In this study, consumers admitted reluctance to share data freely, even with a promise of personalization. Too many didn't understand the connection between their data and this thing called "personalization." But, when faced with an example of an experience that LACKS personalization or omnichannel connection, consumers agree, they'd rather walk with their wallets than face the continued frustration.

Given the example of starting to problem-solve or troubleshoot a problem online, then switching to a chat, then moving over to a phone call only to have to restart the conversation or explanation of the issue or question with every channel jump, 84 percent of consumers expressed frustration over conversation channel changes. When asked if this frustration had ever led them to question their loyalty or why they were doing business with that brand, 71 percent said yes, it had led to doubts, drawing a direct line between the potential for brand abandonment and the lack of connection and consistency cross channels.

In reality, the communications and experiences consumers consistently identified, in question after question, all fall under marketing's strategic banner of omnichannel personalization. Consumers expect to have phone service agents at the ready with details about their history with the brand and armed with the right information to quickly solve problems. Consumers expect to "see themselves" in communications with brands they have done business with... they just don't know to call it personalization.

DO YOU FIND IT FRUSTRATING WHEN YOU HAVE TO START OVER IN A NEW CHANNEL EVERY TIME YOU HAVE A QUESTION?

HAS THIS FRUSTRATION EVER LED YOU TO QUESTION WHY YOU ARE DOING BUSINESS WITH THAT COMPANY?

LET'S LOOK AT VIDEO

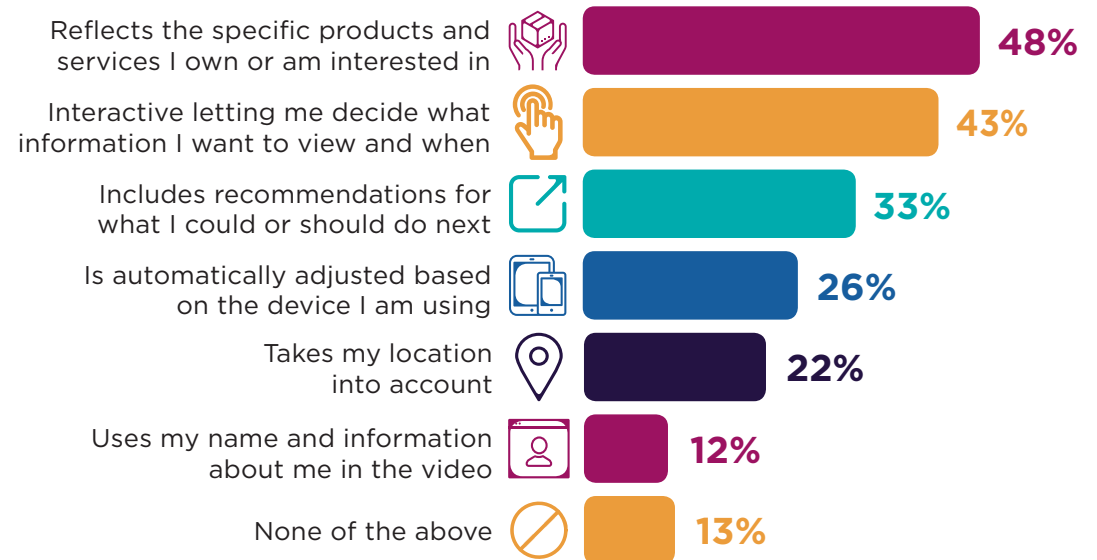

How does this call for personalization and omnichannel engagement actually manifest? For this, video becomes a wonderful example and case study. It is well documented that video is a channel with increasing investment in most marketing line-items. This will be welcome among consumers, especially in younger generations, with a few conditions.

Consumer respondents agree that online video must become more personal to become even more valuable across the customer journey. Consumers issued a familiar call for control and personalization, and even more specifically a desire to see themselves reflected in the content and delivery of each engagement.

First and foremost, 48 percent of consumers want videos to reflect the specific products and services they already own or are interested in. They also want video to be more interactive, putting the consumer in control of what information they can view and when, and to be automatically formatted to reflect where they are watching.

In short: Even with something as new and engaging as online video, consumers expect personalization and omnichannel connections.

WHAT ARE THE IDEAL QUALITIES THAT WOULD MAKE AN ONLINE VIDEO REALLY VALUABLE TO YOU AND YOUR DECISION-MAKING PROCESS?

CONCLUSION

Consumers have selected their channel of choice... a channel that meets their needs and can engage on their terms and in their time. Consumers have selected omnichannel as their channel of choice. “But omnichannel isn’t A channel,” some will argue. In the end, our consumers don’t really care. They want to communicate with brands on their terms.

This exercise was never an effort to select a single, all-powerful channel of communication. Instead it was an exercise in understanding what makes channel selection so important for today’s consumer. What emerged from this research is a clear call to action for brands: it is time to get personal and to arm the front-line resources most likely to directly engage and connect with consumers with the right information to aid and add value to engagements and experiences with the brand.

Brands leading this charge are doing so by turning customer experience journeys into consumer “build-your-own adventures.” Instead of pushing random acts of marketing or even personalization, savvy brands are looking to the consumer for their cues, identifying and answering those moments of need (for example, empowering call center agents with customer details about cross-channel engagements so the customer is not asked to re-start a conversation they started online) or disrupting moments to deliver delight (for example, digitally native brands like Harry’s Shave Club and Casper Mattresses leveraging personalized print mailers and catalogs to cut through the digital clutter of today’s crowded e-mailboxes).

Today’s consumer cannot define personalization any better than they can define omnichannel. They just know they want it... in fact, they need it in order to continue building relationships with the brands they choose to do business with. The good news is that by and large, consumers believe brands are on their way to meeting this expectation. They have seen examples of what is possible and have actively made decisions to forgive missteps on the evolutionary path. But this leniency will only go so far or last so long. Younger generations see personalized omnichannel experiences as their starting point... the table stakes of customer experience. They will soon be the generations setting the tone and tenor of engagement.

Omnichannel is the channel of choice. Personalization is the content of choice. For brands that heed the call, profitability and loyalty are the reward.

EXPERT COMMENTARY

MATT TREDINNICK

Global Director - Product Marketing
Customer Engagement Solutions, Pitney Bowes

Pitney Bowes, in conjunction with the CMO Council, undertook primary research to better understand which “Channels of Engagement” consumers want brands to use in their communications and which channels consumers see as critical. Over 2,000 people in 6 key countries (U.S., Canada, UK, Ireland, Australia and New Zealand) were surveyed, with respondents spanning the 5 key generations of influence: Gen Z, Millennials, Gen X, Baby Boomers and The Silent Generation.

The research revealed dramatic new insights and definitively confirmed some long-held assumptions around how consumers want to be engaged. Above all, respondents across all generations confirmed that “Omnichannel is the Channel of Choice.” Over 85 percent want a mix of physical and digital communications from the brands they choose to engage with.

What does this mean for brands? While the influence of digital continues to grow, owing to the speed and convenience of email, text, web, social and video, organizations cannot or should not forget the influential role of telephone, physical mail and face-to-face interactions as a complete part of their marketing mix.

Omnichannel is the channel of choice.

Personalization is the content of choice.

For brands that heed the call, profitability and loyalty are the reward.

Everyone wants omnichannel...but there are subtle differences.

What exactly are the top channels that consumers value? There is real practical impact in examining the generational details, which reveal that omnichannel is not a one-size-fits-all proposition. While there may be commonalities across generations, the individual generational profiles that emerge from this study can go a long way in helping brands shape channel selection strategies in their omnichannel execution.

In analyzing the survey findings, we looked at consumers across the five generational groups: Gen Z (born after 1997), Millennials (1981 - 1996), Gen X (1965 - 1980); Baby Boomers (1946 - 1964); and the Silent Generation (1928 - 1945). Let’s take a closer look at the research results by generation.

Gen Z: The next generation

As this age group enters the workforce or gains the independence of going off to university, it is shifting from “influencer of parents’ spending” to a buying group on its own. Gen Zers are comfortable juggling screens and interacting across social channels.

Therefore, it’s not a surprise that email ranked first among the channels Gen Z expects brands to use for communications and that texting ranked second. Shifting to a physical channel, Gen Z ranked telephone third in the mix.

Social, at 54 percent, emerges as the channel of choice for discovery of information about new products, solutions or opportunities to save, followed by the web and then video.

Key takeaway: If you’re targeting Gen Z, think social as well as video for discovery and learning, but don’t toss out email or telephone, which are valued for transactional communications.

Millennials: The “me” generation

The experience-oriented millennials came of age with the internet and mobile and are comfortable in the digital world. They expect brands to communicate via email and are happy to communicate via telephone and text.

For their source of new information, Millennials also rank social first, followed by the web. But unlike Gen Z, their third channel of choice for discovery is email. For 48 percent of Millennials, social media is the top influencer channel.

Key takeaway: Millennials are influenced by what they see on social channels, but convenience and reliability are what they value in communications with brands.

Gen X: The individuals

Sometimes called the “middle child” of generations, Gen Xers are the parents of Millennials and Gen Y, and they like their status symbols and luxury goods. The first to grow up with computers, this generation is technologically adept. Nonetheless, in channel preferences they have more in common with the older two generations than the younger two.

They expect email communications with brands, but they are also happy to browse the web or pick up the phone. They turn first to the web for new information and influence, but they do pay attention to social for discovery of new products or solutions.

Key takeaway: Your website is a critical channel for this generation along with email, but don’t neglect social. And be sure you are there to help when they reach out to you by phone. They’ll expect you to know who they are and what their history is with you.

Baby Boomers: Size and diversity

Long the largest segment in terms of numbers (Millennials are set to overtake Boomers in 2019*), Baby Boomers are a diverse group that can defy broad categorization. They have adapted well to technology, with the majority owning computers, smartphones and Facebook accounts. So it’s not surprising that they expect brands to use these communication channels.

Likewise, their channels of choice for discovery are the web, social and email, with the web also ranking first as the leading channel of influence. But the must-have channel is telephone. They want a human involved in the omnichannel experience.

Key takeaway: While a significant number of Baby Boomers qualify on paper as “seniors,” their channel choices tell you not to pigeon-hole them as non-technologically oriented. Make sure this cohort is included in your website and social content strategies.

The Silent Generation: Active consumers

With influences that span The Great Depression, multiple wars and the rise of corporations and consumerism, members of The Silent Generation still vote with their wallets. While you might expect them to favor more traditional written methods of communication such as physical mail, like all the other segments this group ranks email first, followed by websites and then telephone.

When it comes to discovery and influence, the web comes first, followed by email in second place.

Key takeaway: Defying stereotypes, this age group expects you to communicate with them via email and to have a place for them on the web. However, more than their younger cohorts, they place a premium on face-to-face contact as part of their discovery journey.

Be there at THEIR moment of need

Understanding the nuances of what constitutes “omnichannel” for different generations can help marketers reach that sweet spot of being in the right place with the right message at the exact moment of your customer’s need. That is ultimately what consumers think of as personalization, along with a brand’s ability to know and follow them, seamlessly, across all channels of engagement. This is what consumers want from the brands they want to do business with, and the reward for brands that meet this expectation will be loyalty and profitability.

Read “Critical Channels of Choice”, a research study conducted by CMO Council and Pitney Bowes, to learn more about consumer requirements and expectations.

*Washington Post, “The Big Number: Millennials to overtake boomers in 2019 as largest U.S. population group,” January 27, 2019. https://www.washingtonpost.com/national/health-science/the-big-number-millennials-to-overtake-boomers-in-2019-as-largest-us-population-group/2019/01/25/a566e636-1f4f-11e9-8e21-59a09ff1e2a1_story.html

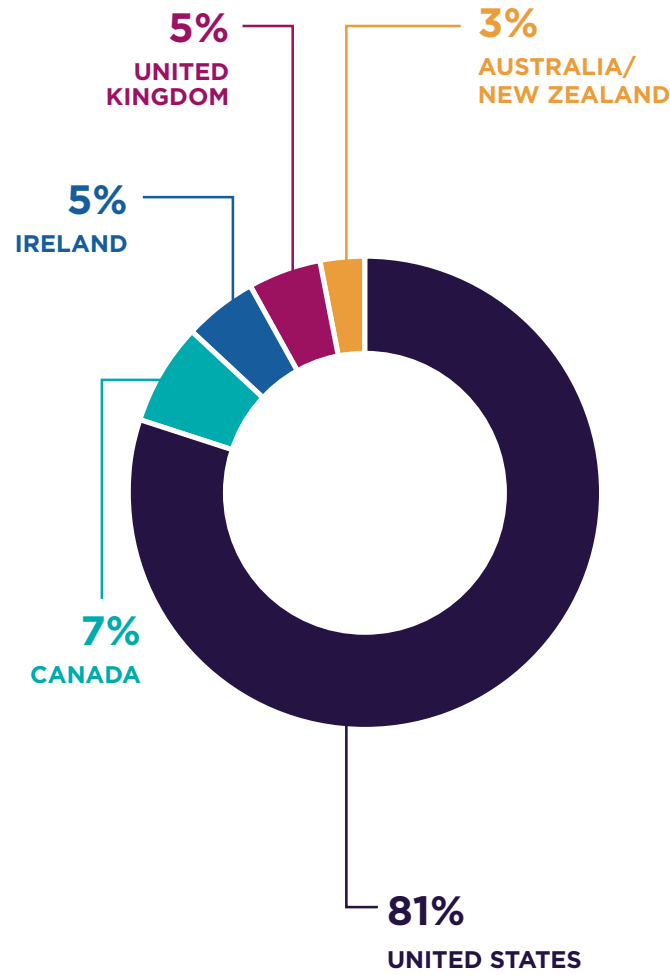

DEMOGRAPHICS

AGE

GEOGRAPHY

SEX

SPONSORS & PARTNERS

CMO COUNCIL

The Chief Marketing Officer (CMO) Council is dedicated to high-level knowledge exchange, thought leadership and personal relationship building among senior corporate marketing leaders and brand decision-makers across a wide-range of global industries. The CMO Council's 15,000+ members control more than $500 billion in aggregated annual marketing expenditures and run complex, distributed marketing and sales operations worldwide. In total, the CMO Council and its strategic interest communities include over 65,000 global marketing and sales executives in over 110 countries covering multiple industries, segments and markets. Regional chapters and advisory boards are active in the Americas, Europe, Asia Pacific, Middle East and Africa. The Council's strategic interest groups include the Customer Experience Board, Digital Marketing Performance Center, Brand Inspiration Center, Marketing Supply Chain Institute, GeoBranding Center, and the Coalition to Leverage and Optimize Sales Effectiveness (CLOSE).

www.cmocouncil.org

PITNEY BOWES

Pitney Bowes is a global technology company providing commerce solutions that power billions of transactions. Clients around the world, including 90 percent of the Fortune 500, rely on the accuracy and precision delivered by Pitney Bowes solutions, analytics, and APIs in the areas of ecommerce fulfillment, shipping and returns; cross-border ecommerce; office mailing and shipping; presort services; location data; customer information and engagement software; services; and financing. For nearly 100 years Pitney Bowes has been innovating and delivering technologies that remove the complexity of getting commerce transactions precisely right. For additional information visit Pitney Bowes, the Craftsmen of Commerce, at www.pitneybowes.com.

ABOUT POLLFISH

Pollfish is transforming survey intelligence with the most accurate, cost-effective results and the quickest survey completion times by reaching respondents 24/7 through online surveys anywhere they happen to be online. Pollfish's survey platform delivers online surveys globally through mobile apps, mobile web and desktop web to ensure your survey reaches just the right audience and provides the most cost-effective and quickest survey results. Only Pollfish lets you survey millions of respondents in real time, 24/7, the world over so you always have the consumer, public or market intelligence you need to stay informed about what the world likes, wants, feels and does. Pollfish has offices in New York and Salt Lake City in the U.S. and is a VC-backed firm. For more information, visit www.pollfish.com.